Many hundreds of years ago each man built his own house and made what furniture he needed, and grew all his own food, and his wife made all the clothes for the family.

But men very soon found that it was much better to divide the work among them, so that one built houses, and another made chairs and tables, and another grew corn, and so on. You can easily see that this was a better plan, because by always doing the same kind of work you can do it far more quickly and easily. Practice makes a man perfect. So nowadays all work is divided up as much as possible. Not so very long ago, before machinery was invented, even such a tiny thing as a pin was not made by one man, but by a dozen or more, each doing his particular bit of the work. One straightened out the wire, another cut it into lengths, another sharpened the point, another put the head on, and so forth.

This plan is called the division of labour.

In the morning when Dharmabuddhi woke up, Papabuddhi said, “Let’s bury our money under this tree. It’s not safe to carry this bag with us. When we need it, we will come here and take it.” Dharmabuddhi was an innocent person. He believed his friend and dug a hole in the ground and buried the bag there.
